

Molly Humphreys is a native Idahoan who has lived in Boise for 20 years. She graduated from Boise State University in 1990 with a degree in Anthropology and put it to use in both federal agency and private sector work as an archaeologist until 1994 when she left Boise to attend graduate school at the University of Idaho. While at UI she studied historic architecture, archaeology, and preservation. In 1996 Molly returned to Boise where she resumed her career as an archaeologist for international environmental consulting companies. She is currently finishing her Masters degree in Interdisciplinary Studies at Boise State with an emphasis in historic archaeology and history.

Professionally, Molly is working as a senior cultural resource specialist for POWER Engineers in Boise. She is interested in large scale landscapes including those associated with ranching and the military presence in southwestern Idaho. She has also been very active contributing to a study addressing the history and future plight of mobile home parks in Boise.

Molly has been married to her husband Jim, a fourth generation Idahoan, for four years. Other family members include two cats and three Australian shepherds.
